New White Paper Provides Information to Families Dealing with a Cerebral Palsy Diagnosis

Chicago-July 30, 2015- Families who have recently learned their child suffers from cerebral palsy face many difficult questions. How will the condition affect their child? What caused the condition? What resources and support is available? The law firm of Cirignani, Heller & Harman, LLP, recently prepared a white paper resource that provides a starting place for those families.

In this white paper, readers will learn more about the condition, its causes and its symptoms. They will have access to a checklist for raising a child with cerebral palsy, which will help them become an advocate for their child's best interests. Readers will also find a list of groups and associations that may be able to provide you with additional resources and support to help their child.

This white paper has been specifically designed to help encourage families who face this challenging diagnosis. Even though currently there is no cure for cerebral palsy, this has not stopped parents from helping their children maximize their potential. They are constantly finding new ways to help their children beat the odds. By embracing technology and advances in therapy, many of their children are engaging in hobbies, playing sports, holding jobs and achieving many other exciting goals. Even with some of the most severe cases of cerebral palsy, parents are helping their children reach their potential and, in some cases, exceed the initial assessments of their doctors.
